New Home Sales Up Less Than Expected; Prices up 7.5% Annually

Sales of newly constructed homes, had a strong start in 2016 but flattened out toward the end of the year and ended with a dismal December. Now 2017 has also started on a positive note. The Census Bureau and the Department of Housing and Urban Development reported sales were up in January by 3.7 percent from the previous month to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 555,000 units. Sales in December, originally estimated at 536,000 units were revised down to 535,000. The January sales were 5.5 percent higher than sales a year earlier of 526,000. On a non-seasonally adjusted basis there were 41,000 homes sold during the month compared to 38,000 in December.

New Home Sales

Analysts had however expected a much stronger recovery from the 10.4 percent nosedive sales took in December. Econoday reported those they polled were looking for sales in a range between 538,000 and 600,000 units with a consensus of 576,000, a 7.5 percent gain.

At the end of January there were an estimated 261,000 homes available for sale (a non-adjusted figure.) This is a larger inventory than existed during any
