Mortgage Rates Holding Near 3-Month Highs

Mortgage rates didn't move much higher today for most lenders. While that absence of additional weakness is "nice," the net effect is that rates remain in line with their worst levels since early April. Technically, there was a day or two in early May that were slightly worse, but not enough to consider today's rates anything other than "3-month highs."

You'd be well within your rights to assume that the highest rates in 3 months must coincide with the all-important Employment Situation (aka "jobs report")--a consistent market-mover that is released on the first Friday of any given month. You'd also be wrong. All--or at least a vast majority--of recent market movement owes itself to general weakness in European bond markets.

As a reminder, bonds dictate interest rates and Global bond markets are somewhat interconnected. That means that US Treasury yields tend to follow European bond yields if the latter are moving aggressively enough, and that's certainly been the case over the past 2 weeks. Fortunately, the bonds that underlie mortgage rates (MBS, or Mortgage-backed-securities) are yet another degree removed from the epicenter of the recent drama. That's why mortgage rates were able to hold relatively steady today despite some additional weakness in Treasuries.
